COUNTER-ATTACK . . . the Occupation of Adak

THE NAVY had a weather station on Kiska. When this station failed to send its usual reports after June 7th enemy interference was suspected. But not until June 11th did the weather permit air reconnaissance. Then Japanese were seen on Kiska and Attu. ★ The next day Eleventh Air Force bombers made runs over Kiska, hitting and setting fire to two cruisers and one destroyer. ★ Two days later the Japanese bombed a seaplane tender at Atka Island and, a week after that, began to reconnoiter Adak. The battle of the Aleutians was becoming a race for the possession of those islands in the chain which were suitable for landbased aviation. ★ Meanwhile we bombed and strafed Kiska and Attu whenever the weather permitted, and our surface ships and submarines attacked Japanese shipping in Aleutian waters. On June 18th a transport was sunk in Kiska Harbor. On July 4th two of our submarines sank three, and possibly four, enemy destroyers. On August 7th U. S. warships shelled Kiska Harbor. On August 31st we took our first Japanese prisoners in this theater—five survivors of a destroyed Japanese submarine. ★ And on August 30th U. S. forces landed on Adak. ★ The first landing boat hit the beach at daylight, seven o'clock in the morning. It was quiet. The men had embarked prepared for almost any kind of trouble, but, twelve hours before they landed, news had come that there were no Japanese on the island. They had won their race. They had gotten there first. ★ And then trouble came, a willawaw,

LANDRUM OF THE ALEUTIANS

ENEMY ATTACK . . . Dutch Harbor bombed

WHEN, ON DECEMBER 7, 1941 the Japanese first attacked the United States at Pearl Harbor we had, on all our Alaskan islands, only two small army posts and naval bases. One was on Kodiak Island. The other was at Dutch Harbor on Unalaska. In all wide-spread Alaska we had but six small army posts. ★ In June, 1942, the Japanese struck at Dutch Harbor. But this time they did not catch us napping. Two secret airfields had been hastily installed just east and west of Dutch Harbor. One was at Cold Bay, near the tip of the Alaska Peninsula. The other was on Umnak Island. The Blair Packing Co. and Saxton & Co., supposed to be canners of fish, were the disguises these secret airfields wore. ★ On June 2, 1942, two Japanese aircraft carriers were reported less than 400 miles south of Kiska. They were moving eastward. Bad weather fought against us there. Air reconnaissance was almost impossible. Patrol planes would find the Japanese, only to lose them again in fog and storm before bombers could be brought to the spot. Bad weather always played a part in Aleutian warfare. ★ On June 3, and again on June 4, bombers and fighters based on these carriers attacked Dutch Harbor. Bad weather fought against American and Japanese alike. All available planes of the Eleventh Air Force had been rushed to our two secret airfields. They went up to meet the Japs, who had thought our nearest airfield was on distant Kodiak. Many of the Japanese planes failed to return to their carriers. Bad weather had a lot to do with that. But that same bad weather made it impossible for our planes to destroy the Japanese carriers or their convoying warships. ★ The enemy task force withdrew from Dutch Harbor, and occupied Kiska, some 700 miles to the west. ★ War had come to the Aleutians—to a chain of islands where modern armies had never fought before. Modern armies had never fought before on any field that was like the Aleutians. We could borrow no knowledge from the past. We would have to learn as we went along, how to live and fight and win in this new land, the least known part of our America.

THE LOYAL COURAGE, vigorous energy and determined fortitude of our armed forces in Alaska—on land, in the air and on the water—have turned back the tide of Japanese invasion, ejected the enemy from our shores and made a fortress of our last frontier. But this is only the beginning. We have opened the road to Tokyo; the shortest, most direct and most devastating to our enemies. May we soon travel that road to victory."

THE BATTLE OF THE ALEUTIANS

In honor and memory of the men of the North Pacific Theater who died so that a continent might be free

A chain of unsinkable aircraft carriers now stretches across the North Pacific—from the shores of Alaska to the threshold of Japan. This small book is a partial record of the men who fought for these Aleutian bases, and the men who built them into impregnable fortresses that history will remember as the Northern Highway to Victory.
